

THE SWIM MEET

It is a warm spring Saturday morning. You are with family members at an indoor swim meet for grade schoolers. Teams are there from several schools. The pool has six lanes and is 20 meters wide. Members of each relay step onto the raised starting blocks, bend sharply at the waist, and dive at the sound of the buzzer to race to the other end of the pool.

Across the pool you notice a middle aged white male dressed in soiled shorts, a wrinkled rugby shirt, with the shirt tail out, badly worn docksiders, no socks. He is sitting alone, on the first level of bleachers, in line with the starting blocks. He seems listless until the children get on the blocks and bend over, then he seems intensely focused on their backsides. As the swimmers dive he sometimes quickly darts to the side of the pool, reaching for his rear pocket.

As the tenth relay responds to the start buzzer, he leaps to his feet, rushes to the side of the pool, draws a small revolver from his rear pocket, and fires a shot.

You are armed with a Firestar 9mm loaded with 124 grain Golden Sabre's carried strong side in the front pocket of you cargo pants. Two spare magazines are in a small zippered pouch, off side. A Surefire 6P is in a Rosen pouch, on your belt. A Benchmade CQC-7 is clipped to your pocket.
